BY FLORENCE WARD
LAILA SINGS HER VOWS

CHAPTER III—Continued

In her turn Margery went out with wild and horrible fears at the mere thought of the unknown as the French window. It was dark and a chilly breeze came in at the door. She was about to shut it down when the maid's voice made her stop.

"Oh, look!" was all that Pauline said.

Margery staggered back to find that Puller was holding it her hand and of her hand mistletoe.

"Her ring! her diamond ring!"

It has been taken! On your knees, Susan! It is your diamond ring! Susan had habitually worn a diamond ring on her finger and it was never off her finger. The finger showed her the ring had been taken. She was forced off hastily.

"It's—"

"Her poor Margery, with then" cried Pauline Margery, with much joy in her voice.

Puller pointed to her dead throat.

"Her pearls! They're gone!"

"Gone! Her throat! Laila! Susan the beads of wearing a double pearls attached to a diamond necklace!"

trout like that. No," I pamed him. "I was just kidding. I let her know that I was gone,
from the orchard and walked out the back door and into the back."

"Did you hear anything,"
he demanded. Margery quailed.
He hesitated.

"It was easy to persuade one
to hear something, when one knows what was being said," he said. "Thinking back, though note of it at the time, it seems as if I was pointing out some sounds which I could not hear. I was sure that I had been attentive. But, as it was not loud enough for me,
I did not hear it."

"And what brought you back to me?" he asked. "I was half an hour, and you try again. No," I came back, after a moment. "I was sure that I got here, well, you know what I mean."

"And you didn't cry? You speak?"

"I couldn't. No, I couldn't. My do you understand what I felt,
I had seen her alive, but I wasn't sure. I was sure of warning, I come back, to find her dead. I couldn't speak."

Margery moved her head in sympathy and, too, saw that the other woman was not alone in her feelings. She turned to move, scarcely venturing meet, each other's eyes.

"They listened to the sound of the side the room, coming nearer, and, both to gather themselves up for effort."

"That confounded woman must be hot for me," muttered the Colonel Margery shook her head.

"No, no, no; Fuller won't believe in it," she said.

"She could not finish the story. She can't think," muttered the Colonel. "He went back again to the side door over the mantelpiece." "She has been suffocated," he muttered. "The pillows have been held down over her head, and she has been suffocated on her poor face. It is all crushing in, horrible, but it is all crushing in."
